CURRENT RESEARCH

Circulations: Death and Opportunity on Mesoamerica’s Costa del Sur, 1500-1630

This book-length project examines migration, networks, and trade along Mesoamerica’s southern Pacific coast in the immediate aftermath of Spanish-Nahua conquest, from Oaxaca to modern-day El Salvador. Following the lead of migrants, merchants, and conquistadors at the time, I take a regional view rather than delimiting the study according to ethnolinguistic, colonial, or national boundaries. Most fundamentally, the study asks whether the circulation of Indigenous people and goods in this place and time represents a response to the traumatic changes of the sixteenth century or a continuity of preconquest patterns.

Director, Nahuatl/Nawat in Central America Digital Project, <http://nahuatl-nawat.org>

An interdisciplinary digital humanities project that consolidates historical Nahuatl documents from Central America and raises new questions about the use and evolution of the language in the region during the Spanish colonial period. The project has four components: the public, online archiving of Nahuatl documents created in Central America; the growing of this corpus of documents via academic sharing; collaborative and public transcription and translation; and analysis of the documents' information using mapping and other software tools.
